

PATTERN FOR PROGRESS

...close to your home

It's no accident that so many people nowadays think of Sears as a part of their own local community. The men who built our company realized early that the progress and prosperity of its customers would largely decide the future of Sears. So they set about doing all they could to speed such progress.

From that common sense decision grew a policy that still guides Sears activities. You'd describe it about like this: Sears believes in putting back into local communities as much as possible of the money such communities spend with Sears.

One important way we do this is to buy our merchandise from many different local manufacturers in various parts of the country—rather than in one or two industrial centers.

What does this mean to you? It means much of the money that flows to Sears flows back to your own area—in many ways to your own town. It means wages and salaries paid by firms who produce our merchandise help support local business. It means surrounding rural areas then find ready markets for their agricultural products, and that helps local business, too.

And what does this mean in actual dollars to you people in the states of Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri and Kentucky... the states served by our Chicago mail order house? Look at these interesting figures:

1. Merchandise valued at $670,831,000 annually is produced for Sears by 3970 local factories in 337 towns in this region.
2. In 1934, wages and salaries of about $162,171,000 were paid to Sears own employees in your part of the country.
3. Sears has a total of $91,943,000 invested in local land, buildings and equipment needed to do business.
4. Local taxes of some $8,476,000, and rentals of $8,094,000 were paid by our company in this area in 1934.

To sum up, today Sears is a living part of every American community. We share the ups and downs of the community, pull our part of the load. Awareness of this responsibility is the sound basis on which our business will continue to grow.
